The reason why I said peacock should be male is because the male peacocks have the colorful feathers

That is just my weird reasoning...
It does sound more like a female name though

@artisticdragon: Just saying, Labradorite, other than it's slightly rainbowish properties, isn't a great raining name. It's named after Labrador, a rocky island province in Canada, (whee, no rainforests) and it's rainbow qualities go between green and blue.

Trust me, I'm Canadian and I also have a huge chunk of labradorite sitting on my desk.

@Castledancing: You are using canon names-lots of them. Kinkajou, handsome,e Grandour, Magneficent, etc are ALL USED AND MADE UP BY THE AUTHOR- Almost copyrighted, you could say. You can't use canon characters- It's basically stealing, or claiming you made them up, not the author.

I'd suggest taking those off your list because a trust me, there are a lot of formers who would get WAY more annoyed than me.

groan You can't just claim names. I've found it to be near impossible to find truly unique names for an OC; someone has almost always used it, except for in very special cases. I've had a Heliconia for a while now.

Since my other one hasn't gotten through: when it comes, you'll see VERY unique names. Plus, Tui didn't put a Trademark on her names, so TECHNICALLY she can't copyright me ... plus, I've seen billions of people use name's that authors have used ... trust me, I'm good at firing people down.

@frost how do you claim names? That's like someone wanting to name their child "Leia" but someone tells them, "No, you can't, I already have that name." Pyrrhia has existed for thousands of years, and in that sense, it is most likely that names were re-used. Certain names become popular over time and it doesn't matter if someone else has them, too.
